I believe that the negative social and environmental impacts of the project are underestimated in the assessment. The vineyards and wine-makers of the hunter valley have gained world fame and given the valley a global identity. Trading this identity against some very specialized, short-term employment through exploitation of natural resources is not a sustainable practice. Wine-making has many hundred years of history in the world (and a bit less in Australia) and will provide employment for future generations while protecting natural resources instead of destroying them.
